I used to be a fan of photoshop, but after switching to LR I can't see a reason for anyone to even consider using photoshop, especially for an average user or ones not needing more than a basic photo editor. Kinda sad that they have the cloud stuff >Gets lonely in that & writes widgets from time to time. No 1 actually using CS5 for me (could be I just associate it with annual subscription).

I guess they decided to go with the new direction of digital content creation and for that LR fills the role, and Photoshop more of a niche tool. I really don't see a need to have the price to go with the CS6, CS6 is just as good but I could have used the cheaper version of the software. Also, it has cloud deal I guess that is the incentive.

I guess I need to find the motivation to tool around with Photoshop :). Can't say if it's better or worse, but it's definitely not my first choice anymore. I guess I need to find the motivation to tool around with Photoshop :). Adobe® Reader® is optimized for non-Apple devices, including OS versions that may not be similar to Apple products. Look for your compatible reader at www.adobe.com/cfusion/servlet/version/showVRMS . I'm no fan of Apple products, especially for desktop use, but I must admit that Adobe Photoshop CS4 is a fantastic application. While I believe that Apple users would rather spend their money on the latest Apple product, not on Photoshop. In fact, I encourage all mobile users to use Photoshop and Cintiq 13HD concerting. There's just no downside to it.

Number of discs– Make sure that the computer has enough discs to store all your projects. The number of discs depends on how often you work on your graphics. A typical Photoshop user should be looking to have at least 20GB of free disc space so that new photos, videos and timelines can be added to the large document without encountering any problems. While the more disc space you have the better but to begin with, as a beginner, 20GB should be more than sufficient. At the lowest point, the highest amount of disc space you may need is 10 or 20GB. Some disc space goes towards saving important Photoshop documents away when you close a document and you can not count on a return. The latter is not really a problem unless you are working on a project and need a quick reference. The main thing is that every software user knows the value of saving and backing up important files. Again, make sure that if you are working on creative media, you have enough free disc space for future projects. Having enough RAM is always a good idea as this is one of the other crucial factors, but if you can afford to have more, having more RAM will definitely make your computer feel a lot more responsive and perform better. This is seriously one of the main reasons that I always buy my computers with more than 16GB of RAM. Both RAM and discs are extremely important in an Adobe Photoshop computer. The other thing to look out for is your processor. Your processor is something that is extremely important for your computer to perform efficiently. Make sure the processor is a high-grade processor as this is the most important part of your computer when it comes to Photoshop. Having a slower processor will not matter if you have the RAM. Buying a low-grade processor from the highest to the lowest, just make sure that the processor is a high-grade one. e3d0a04c9c

Photoshop was launched in 1990, making it the oldest image editing software in use today. It allows you to edit and create images including photographs, graphics, and vectors. It allows you to create and modify photographic images, to edit existing images, and to use it as a vector graphics editor. It offers many improvements since its launch, including clone stamp tools, stippling, error correction, dodge and burn tools, pull up, scaling, and sparkle. Apart from the traditional tools that are provided in the software, Adobe softwares offers a variety of tools for workflow automation, such as adding text to PDF, deduplication, color management, and more. The software also provides various plugins that add additional features like document saving, PDF creation, page locking, page protection, and more. Adobe ideates that the automatic color management feature in the software should make it easy to match the colors of output platforms, and translates a color profile to any output platform by simply clicking a button. This is possible because the program is open source and it consists of the code available for developers. Similarly, the "GIMP" software is also an open source software, which consists of the code that is open to developers. These open source programs are then being used by the software and hardware manufacturers. The software's development is driven by the open source community. The Adobe software offers more than 100+ different features for the users to work with, including professional editing and creation tools. The software also has useful features for photographers, graphic designers and illustrators.
